If I have a function that will be called from different places in my code: void foo() { ... } How do I make sure that only foo() is called once? The results of foo() are not important, it is more about the first call to foo(), not all future calls.

A: If you don't want foo() to be called from other sources than the only place where you are calling it, you can create a local copy of the function: void foo() { //... } void foo2() { foo(); } In this case, you'll never call foo() twice. A: Declare a static member variable: class Foo

```
{ public: static Foo s_Instance; static void foo(); } Foo
```

```
Foo::s_Instance = Foo(); Foo::foo();
```

In case of multiple definitions, the order in which the initializers are evaluated is not specified.
